The right to play Domus Ludens – an international project to promote children's rights

To engage in play and recreational activities is a fundamental and global right of children and youth. In 1989, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child recognized this right within article 31. In the past, practical experiences and various scientific studies have underlined the importance of this right, especially with regard to the individual child development. Regular active playing promotes creativity, social behaviour and strengthens cognitive and motor abilities. Despite all this proven knowledge, the special importance of play is not always taken into account. This applies for the general population but especially for children and youth growing up within the children and youth welfare system. Unfortunately, creative, diverse and individualized playing is not always the main priority here. This is not an intended condition, but the result of lacking resources and capacities in welfare systems.

DOMUS LUDENS – A house that plays!

Domus Ludens translated from Latin and means „a house that plays“ and guiding principle of our European initiative. The overall goal of the Domus Ludens- project is to strengthen the "right to play" of children and adolescents (13-17 yrs.) living in residential care. Together, we are investigating whether regular, structured and professionally guided play has a positive impact on the "well-being" of this particularly vulnerable target group. In addition to that, the project will examine in detail, which cognitive, emotional and social skills can positively be reinforced through regular playing. With the use of pedagogically valuable board games, we will address these competencies very precisely. Within the context of residential care centres, board games are a very suitable, resource-adequate and easily adaptable instrument for collaborative playing.

Long story short!

With the implementation of the twenty-two month pilot project, we have set ourselves clear and ambitious goals. In fall 2021, we will start to train more than thirty international social workers as „ludic agents“, who will then implement the gaming initiative in numerous residential care centres, in three European countries. We are particularly committed to deliver sustainable and diverse results that will be openly accessible for everyone.
